

Loyola University Medical Center Psychiatry Residency Program

Our vision for the Psychiatry Residency Training Program at Loyola University is to help residents grow to become compassionate, knowledgeable, highly skilled and effective psychiatrists for individuals of our increasingly diverse society who suffer with all manner of mental and behavioral health difficulties. We particularly aim to train residents to: Develop a sound understanding of and capacity to work effectively within the interface between medicine and mental/behavioral health. Residents are trained to develop into competent physicians, additionally helping them develop their psychotherapeutic and psychopharmacology skillsets. To view and to treat each patient as a whole person, rather than in compartmentalized medical or psychosocial areas. To be adept with the broad array of factors which influence a person's sense of wellbeing in life. Remain current with the latest developments in behavioral health and to contribute to the field of psychiatry through research. Engage reflective processes to grow professionally and personally throughout their four year residency training experience.
